In our own culture, the experience of Terror is associated with trauma and posttraumatic stress disorder, yet in the late eighteenth century, many physicians in France saw the experience of Terror as constructive, empowering and even therapeutic. This talk explores how physicians and other men of science during and after the French Revolution confronted the experience of Terror and its effects on self and society.